MAME, DAIS AND JIM

Marie More Marsh Tells a Tale of the Carousel.

SHE DIED BECAUSE SHE LOVED

Adventures of Two Girl Chums -- A Hand some Fellow Turns Their Silly Heads. Disappointed One Takes Poison.

Mame and Dalse were chums; they stame and Daise were chum; they worked in the same shop and they be-onged to the same set. Mame always topped for Daise in the morning and Daise brought her basket up to Mame's window at the shop for luncheon, and hey ate together and enchanged con-idences and lavished their admiration and affection, upon another admiration adences and lavished their admiration and affection upon one another quite after the manner of girls in other sets. Mame was a large girl, splendidly formed, a dark, dusky beauty; while Daisy was slight and blonds, with grave, gray eyes and a pink and white stein.

The boys and girls of their set said

The boys and girls of their set said that Mame had a "great shape" and that she was a "fine looker," but that when you come to facts Daise was the "bute" of the set and that she had a "mighty cute little figger," beside.

Daisy was a dainty little creature with naturally refined tastes, and, since she thought "Daisy" a prettier name than Amelia Ann, who can blame her for substituting it for the latter everywhere except in the framed family record which hung in the parlor, too sacred a thing to tamper with? The boys and girls had shortened Daisy to "Daise."

Nature had cast Mame in a larger and coarser meld. Her taste in dress was rather loud and she had a true barberian's eye for gay colors and glitter. She was not naturally fastidious about her dress; she simed for the main effect, re-gardless of detail, and a button off here or a frayed edge there, were to her sninor considerations—of no conse-quence except as they distressed Daise.

Their friendship was no new thing. It had stood the test of several years. They had been through the skating rink mania together; they had gone abreast through the tobargan craze and now they had come to the era of the merrygo-round or carousel and they were still the dearest of friends.

Just then Jim came upon the scend.
Jim was what-d-y-call-it down at the nerry-go-round. I do not use this term in any disrespectful sense, but simply because I have no idea what you do call those fellows who take the fares, help the ladies and children on and off, strap the timid ones to the wooden animais for safety, and pay all those little attentions which are so necessary for the comfort of the patrons of the ce-

Jim had an eye for beauty, and when Mame and Daise entered the hall he thought that he had never seen two anch pretty girls in his life. They were escorted by Mame's little brother Dick; for the girls had an idea of the propri-eties, and Dick was often called upon to chaperone them in the absence of other pany;" and he was as strict in his duty as any middle-aged duenna.

Mame wore a red sailor hat on her hort black curls; her cape and must rere supposed to be of monkey skin, but whatever the material, they were becoming. A Nelly Bly cap of black velvet crowned Daisy's blonde braids, and if her cape and muff were only an imitation of beaver what was that to

Jim was always the same, courteous and polite and attentive to all; but he lingered a little over helping Duisy, as igh it were a pleasant task. Sometimes he ventured a little compliment as he put her foot in the stirrup. It was not much-something about wondering at what store they kept such little shoes as she wore—but Daisy would smile and blush, and Mame, noting the blush, would mutter something to berself about Jim's being "pretty

After Dick and Mame had left Daisy at her gate one night, Dick said: "I tell you. Mame, it's gettin' to be a dec give-away: this goin' to the merr'-go-round so much. Looks as if one of you girls was gitten' mashed on somebody or 'nother." "What do you mesn?"
saked Mame. florcely, giving him a shake that made his teeth rattle.
"Mean what I said," said Dick, sturdily; and Mame harried into the house with-

They didn't go after that for some time. Mame put Daisy off with one ex-cuse or another, until Daisy finally coaxed Dick to take them, and Dick was no polite to tell her what he had told Mame; and so they went.

Jim's face brightened when he saw the girls, and Dalsy looked fairly radi-ant. As he helped her on her favorite piebald, Jim whispered to Dalsy with a pressure of the hand. "You're lookin" pressure of the hand, "You're lookin' out o' sight to night, Daise."

As the girls were preparing to go home, Jim made an errand to the part of the hall where they stood. Mame was helping Daisy on with her cape, and Jim fumbled a moment with their muffs, which lay on one of the chairs; then he hurried back to his work.

muffs, which lay on one of the chairs; then he hurried back to hie work.

When Mame thrust her hands in her muff she felt a folded paper, and the contact mude her heart jump and sent a little thrill to her finger ends. She was wild with excitement and joy. Jim had put a note there for her—for her. At the gate she threw her arms shout Duisy's neck. "Good night, Daiss, hear." she said, giving her a hug, "and I say, put on your best togs and to-morrow we'll go to the mat in the afternoon. The ferelady said we could get off, sure. It's my treat, mind," and Mame hurried on with Dick.

She went upstairs two steps at a time and she put the little karosene lamp on her burgest and threw herself into a chair, still in her outdoor wraps. With pager fingers she unrolled the sheet of paper and read "Dear Daiss"—then the room began to whirl and everything got black and confused.

When the room became clear to her again she saw the note—Daisy's note—n her lap. There was a wild light in her eyes as she took it up and read it to the end. Jim had evidently expented to see Daisy somer than he had dend.

see Dairy somer than he had dense there is my time of me fiving.

Yours forever Jim."

It was all rather husty, to be sure, but that was the way they did courting in Mame's set.

Mame's face was ghastly white at there were deep lines about her tightly of perfect despair in her eyes, but they were dry and tearless. From her drawer she took a box of paper and enpes; then she sat down on the fleor wrote, balancing her writing on

It was slow work. Mame was not and to writing, and the pen sputtered and the ink was pale. When she had inished, she folded the other notefinished, she tolled the count finished, she tolled the count and stamped it and addressed the envelope; then she stole softly out of the house, bare-headed, and dropped it into the post box on the corner.

Whee she came back she undressed.
Slowly and deliberately she put the little room in order, and even crossed the floor to pick a ravelling of thread from the carpet.

Then she went to the little shelf over bottle of some brown stuff. It was laudanum and Mame sometimes took it for neuralgia. She did not measure out the drops this time. She poured all the for neuralgia. She did not measure out the drops this time. She poured all the liquid into a medicine glass and swal-lowed it quickly, then she went to bed. They found her in the morning quite dead. There was a strong edor of laud-anum in the room and there was the empty bettle. They knew that she nometimes used the drug and they sup-posed that she must have taken an overlose. No-there had been no trouble there was no reason why she should is she had been very happy the night

It was a mistake, that was all. Girls is other sets make such mistakes some mes, you know.

Dalsy and Jim sat together in a great hired back. The ribbon at Daisy's throat was black, not blue, neverthe-less Jim's arm stole about her waist with a comforting pressure, regardless of the fact that the carriage contained two other "mourners," and Dalsy, weeping silently, did not push it away. Daisy locked herself in her room that night, and once more she read Mame's letter to her.

"Deer Daise I couldn't help reading your note. I gess I was sort of crasy. I never went back on you before, and you will forgive me this time, wen't you Desse. I seen Jim was stuck on you from the first and I know you love him and I hope you will be happy. Always remember that I love you true Daise and pleas don't bare me ill will for reading your note.

Dalsy kissed the little paper, and lighting a match, she carefully burned it to ashes. "Mame dear," she whis-pered, "nobody ever shall know." MARIE MORE MARSH.

APPRECIATION OF AMERICA.

Shortly after the maneuvers of 1889 he received our minister, William Walter Phelps, in a manner more than complimentary, saying, among other things: "From chilahood I have admired the great and expanding country you represent; and the study of your history, both in peace and war, has

Geo. M. Edison, M. S. Crosby, iven me particular pleasure. Among the many conspicuous characteristics of your fellow citizens the world admires in particular their spirit of enterprise, their respect for law and their invent-Germans feel themselves the more drawn to the people of the United States because of the many ties that in-evitably accompany kinship of blood. The feeling which both countries entertain most strongly is that of relationship and friendship of long standing; and the future can only strengthen the heartiness of our rela-

This, I venture to say, is the most friendly language ever used by a Germen ruler or cabinet towards the United States, and it gains the more in value by coming from the mouth of a man who would not have said anything that he did not fully mean. The per-sonal regard entertained for Mr. Phelps made the emperor's language perhaps more easy for him; but, in addition to that, I am sure that few Germans who have not traveled in America are better nformed of our conditions, our history, our resources and our literature than he. When "Battles and Leaders of the Civil War" appeared it was read by him with interest; as an officer in the army he attended courses of lectures on our principal military operations, and only within the past few weeks he was dis-cussing with an American George Ken-nan's work on the treatment of Siberian exiles.—Poultney Bigelow, in Century.
